200,000 Years

It took us over 200,000 years to come up with the concept of "moral values" and "rationality". It might take us another 200,000 years to establish them fully on a global level and for all life forms.

(Knowledge + Intelligence) x Morals

Enough Knowledge + Intelligence should inevitably lead to Morals, but if it doesn't, we would need to adjust the formula to (Knowledge + Intelligence) x Morals.

Fame

Being famous doesn't mean anything. What counts is what you are famous for.

Extinction

Beings needing to digest other beings for survival shouldn't be saved from extinction.

Survival

A fundamental rule of nature appears to be survival at any cost. Individual survival, but even more so the survival of the race/species.

Democracy/Epistocracy

Democracy works best with well educated and morally driven voters and representatives, else it might lead to catastrophic results. At the moment, a morally driven epistocracy might be the better choice.

Success

Success isn't necessarily an indicator for excellence.

Unity

We are too busy dividing ourselves from one another, overlooking the things we have in common.

Tolerance

Its challenging to practise tolerance, even with those who aren't tolerant themselves.

Freedom/Desire Balance

It requires some of your freedom to establish some of your desires. On the other hand, some of your desires might establish even more freedom. A good approach is keeping the balance.

A Few Concrete Steps To A Better World

Fully democratise the United Nations there every country on the planet has voting rights relative to their population, or at least implement the most democratic approach possible.

Dissolve privileges such the "Security Council", etc.

Make the United Nations 100% transparent for all of the planet's population. Ensure that all of the planet's population has full access to all information and is able to interact fully.

Make all United Nation decisions binding.

Agree to rational objectives and strategies (for each country and/or overall):

- Constitution driven by high moral values
- Population control
- X% of GDP for education, health, defence, supporting developing countries, etc.
- Etc.
